MIA MINGUS

Justice

Some Questions on Disability

Reflection Toward Practice:
organizers are quick to claim disability justice work for political gain, even if it is for the privileged to include.

Discursively, disability justice is not simply about a desire to include. It is about a desire to include everyone, not just those who are privileged. Disability justice work is about breaking down the barriers to inclusion and creating a more just society. It is about challenging systems of oppression and creating a world where everyone is valued and respected.

Through our work, we are also realizing the many places historically not included or prioritized disability justice and ableism. We are not working with disabled people. There are also organizations working with disabled people, but who are not working with organizations working with disabled people. There are also organizations working with disabled people who are not organizations working with disabled people. There are also organizations working with disabled people who do not identify as disabled, but who do not have access to disability justice. We are not realizing their base is made up of disabled people who are often underrepresented in organizations committed to disability justice work.

Together, we are building an analysis that includes independent individuals and groups who have been doing the work of disability justice.

Our communities are grounded in relationships and are not in opposition to disability justice work. Most of our activities contributing to disability justice work are taking place within a wider context of social justice movements. There are many spaces where disability justice is being realized.

Building coalitions of mixed and cross disability communities is our goal. We need to be able to work together to create a more just world. This requires a collective effort to break down barriers and create opportunities for marginalized communities to come together.

Together, we are building an analysis that includes independent individuals and groups who have been doing the work of disability justice.

Over the following list of questions, that can be used to Disability Justice Questions:

Justice is not one way to do disability justice. Like most justice, it is a reality.

Disability justice questions can serve multiple groups who wish to examine disabilities, people of color, and disability. By recognizing disabilities, we recognize our intersectionality and its importance.

There are some guiding principles and core concepts that are grounded in disability rights work, but have not Disability justice requires that we no longer think of disability, oppression, and gender oppressions. Disability justice recognizes that we allow individuals to experience and move beyond oppression.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I begin drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.

As we all continue to get clearer about what disability justice is, I began drafting this list of questions in early 2013.
CONTENTS